Forging resilient local economies

Renold Building, The University of Manchester, Sackville Street Campus, Manchester

In the last year, our local economies have experienced change and we have entered new and uncertain times. With this changing economy comes an urgency to forge resilient places for the future through the development of new ideas and new approaches to economic development and regeneration at a local level; resilient places which can:

- ride economic punches;
- bounce back from adversity;
- adapt to changing circumstances and remain flexible;
- repel and reduce future impacts from climate change;
- ensure that no one community or cohort of people lose out and continue to reduce economic inequality.

The 2009 CLES Summit will be the premier event on the local economy and regeneration calendar. Over two days it will examine how we deal with local economic challenges and develop the new approaches to strategy, policy and delivery required to create resilient local economies.

Based on 23 years of experience gathered from our members and numerous studies over the years, CLES believes that a strong local area requires management of social, commercial and public economies working together to achieve outcomes for the whole area. The conference will explore these three economies hearing from major players within each sector.
